Distribution of Agreement Percentages with Biden

The histogram shows how much different representatives agree with President Biden. We see two main groups: Democrats (blue) who mostly agree a lot, and Republicans (red) who mostly agree very little. This highlights the big partisan divide in support for Biden's policies.

To sum up, these visualizations show a very divided political scene – as we also see in the news. Party affiliation is what decides on agreement with Biden's policies, even more than how Biden did in a representative's district. This suggests party loyalty often is what matters when someone votes, regardless of their constituent preferences. It also shows the challenges Biden keeps facing getting bipartisan support to pass his agenda.

Agreement with Biden vs. Biden's Margin in Districts

The scatter plot shows the link between how much representatives agree with Biden and how well Biden did in their districts. There's a positive trend: Democrats (blue) are mostly in the upper right, and Republicans (red) are in the lower left. This means reps from pro-Biden districts agree more with him(as expected), and those from anti-Biden districts agree less. The black trend line highlights the pattern. Some exceptions are Democrats from anti-Biden districts who still agree a lot and Republicans from pro-Biden districts who agree very little.
